

The Origin of the Sunstone Link

An ancient text discovered deep within the Ruins of Eldoria reveals the intricate forging process and the heavy toll paid by the first keepers of the radiant stone.

In the era before the Great Sundering, when the skies were still unmarred by the ash of the Dragon Wars, the Master Smiths of High-Hearth sought to capture the essence of dawn itself. They labored for forty cycles, tempering meteor-iron in the flames of the eternal forge, seeking a vessel capable of holding pure celestial light.

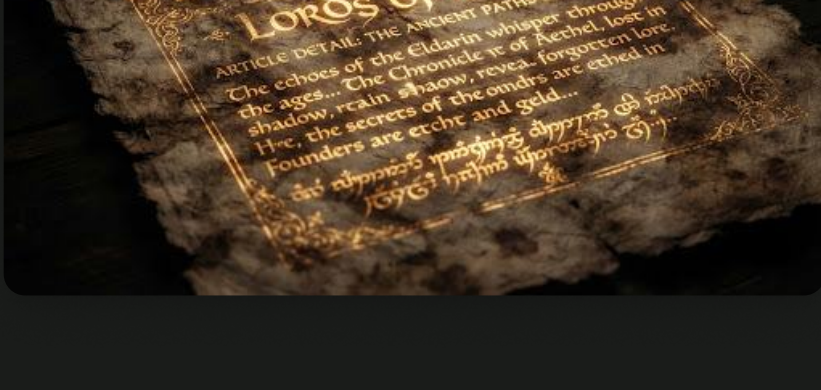

The Sunstone Link was not merely crafted; it was sung into existence. The chorus of the Forge-Priests, ancient texts suggest, vibrated at a frequency that altered the very structure of the gemstone, aligning its crystalline lattice to receive the blessing of the Solari.

"To hold the Sunstone is to hold a captured star, a burden of light that burns away the shadows of deceit, yet risks blinding the bearer to all else."

– THE OBSIDIAN CODICES, VOLUME III

The Toll of Radiance

But such power did not come without sacrifice. The first keeper, Lord Aethelgard, found that the link demanded a steep price. Its radiant energy seeped into his veins, granting him unmatched vitality but slowly crystallizing his heart. As the years passed, he became less man and more monument, a living beacon bound eternally to the artifact he swore to protect.

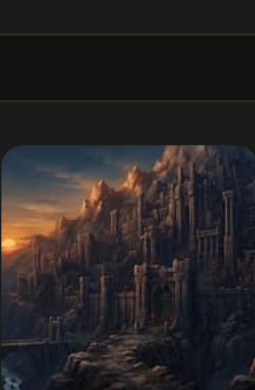

The Engravings

Upon close inspection, the inner ring of the link bears microscopic runes, readable only when subjected to pure moonlight. These runes translate to a binding oath, intertwining the soul of the bearer with the fate of the realm.

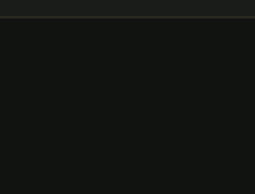

It is said that the Sunstone Link was eventually lost during the Fall of Aethelgard, hidden away by his loyal retainers to prevent it from falling into the hands of the Shadow-Weavers. Its current whereabouts remain one of the most enduring mysteries of our age, a prize sought by scholars and warlords alike.
